The present invention relates to a system and method for continuously determining and recording blood pressure, blood glucose level, and pulse rate and pulse oximetry or other electrocardiographic data in real time without the need to obtain a blood sample. As is well known, monitoring a patient's condition using multiple sensors is a requirement in modern medical practice. Recently, as a result of the increased use of sensors in monitoring blood glucose levels of patients being treated with insulin, it is common practice for a hospital to install and monitor the use of glucose sensors in a hospital's intensive care unit (ICU) or emergency room (ER). Continuous monitoring of other conditions is also becoming common. For example, it has become common practice to continuously monitor blood glucose levels, as well as blood pressure and pulse in critically ill patients. This is an important parameter in the care of these patients. Pulse oximetry and electrocardiographic (ECG) data can also be obtained from these patients in real time or near real time. Typically, these sensors (e.g., glucose sensors) are inserted into the patient's body through a catheter attached to the patient. This sensor is then continuously monitored (typically for a 30 minute period) until the sensor is removed from the patient. While this is going on, the data from the sensor is recorded f678ea9f9e
